

The Business & Management Learning Series:

SR&ED

Would you like to know how your competitors are lowering their costs to win bids at your expense?

A government program exists that you may have assumed doesn't apply to you. The Scientific Research and Experimental Development (SR&ED) program is a federal government incentive program that encourages innovation in Canada. A common misconception is that the SR&ED program is only for companies engaged in traditional white lab coat activities while in fact the incentives apply in many other environments such as construction.

The program offers incentives in the form of cash and tax credits of 20% to 41% on qualified expenses. The Canadian government provides over $4.5 billion in incentives to more than 18,000 claimants each year; many of these are in the construction industry. Your competitors are taking advantage of this program to provide a competitive advantage.

If you want to learn how you can ensure you receive the cash refunds available to you, join us on February 22nd to learn if you qualify.
